Natalie's Pet

H. UNCLE NAT," said said Natalie, "I'm so glad you've come. Now I'll have some one to help me feed my pet."

Natalie's young uncle set his suitcase down on the porch and gathered his niece and namesake into his arms. "You are the best pet I know," he said.

"Where are mother and daddy?" "They're at a golf tea or something, and I am to receive you. It'll be a good chance for you to get acquainted with Cleopatra."

"Cleopatra! Well, where is her majesty?"

"Just wait a second till I get her milk. You see, I'm raising Cleopatra on a bottle and it's lots of work. You'll help me every day, won't you, Uncle Nat?"

Uncle Nat had never yet refused any request of Natalie's and he would not begin now, though he did not feel any great enthusiasm for nursing a baby lamb, as he supposed Cleopatra to be.

"Of course, dear," he answered. "When he beheld the broken-tailed little Berkshire pig that Natalie proudly introduced to him as Cleopatra, Uncle Nat gasped."

"Child, what an odd pet!" "She's a darling, Uncle Nat," declared Natalie. "Don't you like little pigs?"

"Well, I've never considered them exactly bewitching," he confessed.

"But this one's so pretty and she's had lots of trouble. Her mother wasn't good to her, so Mr. Hodge up at the farm said I could have her, and Bill, the hired man, broke her tail when he was trying to catch her. Now, you hold the bottle for her while I tie on her sash. I tie it around her when she begins to drink and she gets so much fatter it stays on splendidly. Isn't she cunning the way she swells out while she's drinking?"

"Very interesting, indeed," murmured Uncle Nat.

As the last drop of milk disappeared, he straightened his back and asked humbly: "How often do you—do we feed her?"

"Only four or five times a day. You'll see how Cleopatra will like you, specially, Uncle Nat, 'cause you hold the bottle for her."

Her uncle smiled weakly in an endeavor to look properly gratified at the idea of gaining the pig's affection. It did not occur to him that Cleopatra would begin, as she did the very next day, to follow him about.

"It's an honor I could well spare," he said to his brother-in-law one morning, when they were obliged to give up a set of tennis because Cleopatra would insist upon endangering her life by running at his heels on the court and the fear of stepping back upon her spoiled his game. "Some men achieve pigs and others have pigs thrust upon them."

"It's all your own fault, Nat," said Natalie's father. "Natalie wanted my assistance in the commissary department, but I declined firmly. You are too weak-minded about Natalie." That young person's father laughed. "I prefer a dog, myself, but an attendant pig is very becoming to you."

"You think you're funny, don't you?" said Nat, wistfully. "I wish you'd tell Natalie to keep her pet where she can't see me this afternoon. I'm going to take a walk down to the station."

"That's so: Miss Benton is expected today. I wonder how she will take to Cleopatra? Will it be 'Love me, love my hog?' Do you recall that old poem? 'There was a lady loved a swine?'"

Nat cast a scornful glance upon his brother-in-law and then stroiled away with faithful Cleopatra at his heels.

A pretty girl was just alighting from the parlor car that afternoon when Nat, who was hurrying toward her, heard a familiar squeal. Then, instead of greeting the new arrival, he made a wild dash for Cleopatra, as she stood bewildered amid the waiting trunks and automobiles, her gay pink sash untied and bedraggled and her voice raised in fear. Then, clasping the rescued one safe in his arms, he turned red and perspiring, and faced an amused group of travelers to find Miss Benton's eyes upon him.

"How do you do?" she said. "I didn't know you were so fond of pigs."

"It's Natalie's pet, Cleopatra," Nat hastened to explain. "She has a bad habit of following me. It seems that I can't escape her, though I thought I had done so this time. Laugh if you like, it won't make me feel any more uncomfortable than I do already."

"I don't feel like laughing," replied Miss Benton, with a gravity Nat thought adorable, "and I suppose 'pigs' is pigs," but I think I shall like Cleopatra."

There was something in the understanding look she gave Nat that made him forget the contented little animal that was snuggling against his shoulder.—Chicago Daily News.

THE ROCKEFELLER FOUNDATION

(From the May Hampton's Magazine.)

John D. Rockefeller has announced his purpose to incorporate his fortune of somewhere from a half billion to a billion dollars as a sort of benevolent trust. Inspection of the dental equipment of a gift horse is traditionally bad manners, but in this instance there certainly is reason for a serious inquiry whether the American people want to accept this gift.

We must decline to be carried away by the hysterical sentimentality with which Mr. Rockefeller's announced purpose has been received. Nothing could be more unfortunate than to get the public into a mind of willingness to accept magnificent benefactions of this kind as a bribe from great aggregations of capital for the privilege of continuing methods which are generally illegal and always antisocial.

If people are to be bribed into acquiescence of trust methods and tacit endorsement of trust morals, it may be accepted at once that consolidation and centralization of wealth will go on hereafter more rapidly than ever before.

Mr. Rockefeller has had introduced into congress a bill to grant federal incorporation to the Rockefeller Foundation which will perpetually administer his estate. This foundation is designated to be a great business organization on one side, to keep the great Rockefeller fortune rolling up like a snowball into a greater and greater fortune; and on the other side it is to be a philanthropic agency to distribute in charities, benefactions, education, etcetera, whatever part of the usufruct may impress the managers as a proper and timely salve to the public feelings.

Think of it! Though we do not permit entailment of estates, we are solemnly asked, in the name of humanity and of charity, to grant a charter which will amount to perpetual entailment of the world's greatest estate ever got together in the world's history. The managers would have complete control of investments and organization. They would conserve their resources in whatever fashion their own will might dictate. Being a federal incorporation, the power of any particular state to interfere with the managerial methods would be largely destroyed. The properties now controlled by the house of Rockefeller would be retarded in that control and inevitably would increase under the policy inherited from the thrifty Mr. Rockefeller. In short, if the Standard Oil of today is a monster the Rockefeller Foundation will be very easily become a whole army of Frankensteins.

Bribery of the public conscience and the social instinct is bad enough. The fabrication of such a creature as it is proposed to endow with perpetual existence and unbelievable powers is bad enough. But entirely aside from these considerations there is an aspect in which congress must very carefully consider this "gift from the Greeks."

The great case in which the federal government has demanded the dissolution of the Standard Oil Company as a conspiracy is now before the supreme court of the United States for appeal. The circuit court of appeals has already decreed dissolution of the corporation and distribution of its properties. Mr. Rockefeller absolutely dominates the Standard Oil Company. It is the head and center of the Rockefeller aggregation of wealth.

So that we have presented the remarkable spectacle, on one side, of this great criminal corporation awaiting sentence on a capital charge, and on the other side of congress proposing to grant a new charter, which, in the opinion of many people, might easily be made the means of giving to the Rockefeller trust a new lease of life on terms vastly more advantageous to it than any which even the marvelous corporation code of New Jersey has ever conferred.

We are thoroughly justified in looking upon Mr. Rockefeller's charitable proposal with suspicion. It is not narrow mindedness that forces us to this suspicion. We have long wondered just how the adroit legal minds of Mr. Rockefeller's lawyers would handle Standard Oil in case the supreme court should uphold the lower court and put the trust out of business. We have felt sure that these capable brains would devise some method—possibly new and unique—for allowing the mammoth combination to continue its work. Yet in our most naive guesses we never thought of charity and the proverbial sins she covers!

It would be a great joke on the American public if such a thing as this should happen.

There is a tendency to have girlies quite wide in front.

So They Were Married

Hostess at her first postnuptial tea, the brand-new matron solemnly eyes the girls who clustered about the table and her tones were weighty and portentous.

"Girls," she said, "the most agonized morning of my life was my bridal morning—and George's. It's really quite a long story. You see, just as soon as my wedding day was decided upon and publicly announced, all my friends seemed to feel that it was up to them to help celebrate. Forthwith began a succession of showers, card parties, dinners and theaters, which was harder physical work and a bigger mental strain than anything I'd ever known."

"I would reach home about two o'clock in the morning from some northern suburb to meet myself starting out for a luncheon down near the Indiana line. During the salad course of that luncheon I would have to excuse myself to my outraged hostess and make tracks for Evanston, there to grace with my presence a library shower given in my honor. At six o'clock I was due at Oak Park, where a distant cousin was to give a dinner for me and following that ordeal was a theater party. A midnight supper downtown came next and the hour and a half that were left to me out of the 24 were passed with the hair-dresser, who repaired the ravages of the day's hairdresses."

"It was very evident that if I continued at the same rate reefs would have to be taken in all the garments of my trousseau," went on the brand-new matron. "George wanted me to go to a sanitarium, he's so unselfish. You know it would have killed him if I had gone away from him."

"The night before we were married," went on the brand-new matron, "mother gave the bridal party dinner. The crowd of us danced and had music and talked till most three. And at nine next morning I was to be married—and George! It couldn't be a bit later, for the only train we could take left at ten. And I was determined, and so was George, to go nowhere but to Bois Rouge, Canada, where we had the dearest little log cabin right in the heart of a forest."

"I was too exhausted when I tumbled into bed to realize that on the morrow I was to be married to George. I fell asleep like a clod, with no more romance about me than I had been a lump of mortar. I was determined to get every minute of my allotted hours of sleep. There would be plenty of time to dream beautiful poems up at Bois Rouge, with George. Perhaps you girls can imagine my consternation at feeling myself yanked ruthlessly by the arm in what seemed to be about five minutes after I had gone to sleep and then seeing mother bending over me."

"Child, it's eight o'clock!" she gasped.

The words were like an electric shock. I leaped into my old shoes on one bound. I nabbed my comb and wound my hair in an antique coil at the nape of my neck, though my hat had been specially designed for the latest style of turban hairdressing."

The girl guests appreciated the catastrophe and looked profound sympathy.

"My old-rose color suit was the handsiest," went on the brand-new matron, "and I slipped into it without so much as a glance in the mirror. I elided down the stairs, gulped a swallow of coffee in the kitchen and then rushed down the street, putting on a pair of soiled white chamois gloves, which I had grabbed in my excitement. I quaked as I neared the church, but with the courage born of desperation I peeked in at the door. Girls, there were no ushers in evidence, but scattered about the church, even in the
